

CNBC/ Special Report, June 21, 2004

“True Takes Out Ad in Wall Street Journal”

Broadcast transcript

MARIA BARTIROMO, co-anchor:

Let me ask you a little bit about the controversy over your match.com holding. Last week, the CEO of one of your small competitors, True Beginnings, took out a full page ad in the Journal, basically asking what is Barry Diller afraid of because you are suing former employers.

Mr. BARRY DILLER (InterActive Corp Chairman and CEO): I know and since we are really not afraid, I-I-I thought it was is curious but what they want to do is establish themselves by kind of using match.com's bigger name, et cetera.

We are going through a process with the people that work for match.com to be certain that they are not using the intellectual property that belongs to us elsewhere. Which is by the way, a kind of relevantly, every day occurrence.

It has happened to us dozens and dozens of times where we certainly want to be certain that the people can work wherever they want. They can stop working at match.com and go to work anywhere. We just want to be careful about what knowledge they use from whence they have been.